My secret: I put a lot of hard work to make sure the people who have downloaded my software are sure they're getting a real product. I actually make sure that I've cleared my conscience before I start so they know I'm not making any money from the trial. With that said, it seems to me that after a software is downloaded the first time, the author can't really be sure that the person downloading it won't use it and add it to their dictionary or something else just to be able to use it. The problem is that they can delete it from their computer afterwards (even if they have paid for the full version) and the author won't be able to sue them if they're using it for pirating or something else. The good news: I'm not a lawyer. All I can tell you is what I know from my experience in the software industry and from feedback I've received about this problem. With that said, here are some of my personal strategies to protect my software from being used illegally: 1. During the first time I make a trial version available. I want it to be downloadable from both the GooglePlay Store and the AppStore (for Android users). 2. I don't make that trial version available for purchase so I know that the person who downloads it is sure to use it for a legitimate reason (or else he would have bought the full version). 3. I manually uninstall the trial version once the person has finished with it. Most of the times I've been asked about what happens if I don't delete it, I would tell them that I manually remove it so that they know that the trial version has been removed and not the full version. I've been told that all of this seems to scare the average person into a full purchase. 4. I provide a 1-month free trial period after the purchase. By giving them a chance to try out the software and give it a real shot, I know that they're going to be more careful when they're going to be using the software. That's why the trial period is an important part of this strategy. 5. I don't allow you to have the trial version on two different devices at the same time. This is a very interesting strategy I've come up with and works much better than the previous one b7e8fdf5c8
